Our Playbook — simple rules we work with

We are ready to commit to projects once we hear something concrete from the client.

We intend Abakhi to be an independent contractor in the performance of our services. Abakhi shall have the right to control and determine the method and means of performing the services, and retains the right to work for other clients during the time frame of the relationship with clients. Abakhi is responsible for all expenses required for performance of services, except in cases where these services are explicit dependencies of the client projects.

We take an Open Source first approach to making software, unless the client objects to that on some reasonable grounds. The client gets read access to the source code, but gets write access (ability to download/clone the source code) after payment of invoices.

We respect our clients' confidentiality so we'll never share clients information without their consent. We however maintain the right to list the client as having being our client and also adding the project to our portfolio.

When we commit to a project, the client's role would be that of a product manager, making sure that the development meets the client's specifications/requirements. We are also happy with any assistance the client can provide. Please note that this only applies to the projects under discussion and does not extend to a membership or ownership stake in Abakhi.

Code of conduct

1. Be nice. We are all just trying to build great stuff, so please be mindful of your language and behaviour. Our tolerance level for assholes is very low.
2. Be Open. Feel free to open up about any issue that you think it's not right. We are always ready to learn and improve our craft.
3. Pay us on time because we also deliver the projects on time.
